LONGSTREET.

The Old Corps Commander in a New Role.

From the New Orleans Times. The New York Tribune's version of a conversation between Gen. Longstreet and a reporter, will not be credited by many of our readers as at all consistent with the character and antecedents of the distinguished General. There are others who are familiar with the General's idiosyncracies and his remarkable simplicity in all political questions, as well as with his impatience in adversity, and his overweening desire for preferment, who think that this sketch is a probable and just one.

We should not consider ourselves justified in adopting this view and giving previous years; for Longstreet, in the character of political adviser and mon-itor of the Southern people, we believe that there is but one sentiment throughout this section, in which he is still held in the highest respect for his military virtues and services-it is that of profound pity and sorrow. We are not of those who ascribe these observations of Gen. Longstreet to selfish, ambitious, or avaricious motives-who charge a manifest purpose to gain favor with the dominant party in order to restore his broken Thos L. BARRET, Req., J. W. KSIGHT, M. D., fortunes and establish himself in life. We discard all such imputations and find a full explanation of his eccentricities, in that simplicity often allied with high merit-that leads men of strong characteristics to imagine that they are strongest in that in which are weakest. Just as Oicero imagined he was a great poet when he wrote wretched doggerel, and Demosthenes, that he could command armies better than he delivered orations. So the worthy ex-Confederate corps commander, who handled large bodies of men in the field with great skill and address, fancies that his role and his highest attributes are those of the profound and sagacious statesman who can comprehend at a giance the political situation and the future, and solve the most difficult problems of government, This is the amusing infatuation of Gen. Longstreet. It is due to him and to his Northern admirers that they should be notified hereof, lest they may be deceived and do him great injustice. Gen. Longstreet is, we have no doubt, perfectly honest and sincere in his conviction that he is the only states man in the South. Why should anybody desire to disturb the worthy General in this pleasant, and daring, and altogether innocent and harmless conceit and delusion? If the great Fred-erick could amuse the dull hours of his winter quarters by writing wretched verses which he committed to the critical view and approval of the illustrious Voltaire, surely we may be indulgent to the distinguished ex Confederate corps
